What makes Henry V such an effective leader?

In the play, Henry V is portrayed as a very good king, and even regarded as a very good leader. This is because Henry has some characteristic characteristics which make him a great leader.

Henry has an amazing quality of speaking. He has the ability to change the style of speech to suit the mood and atmosphere that he is trying to create. At times in the play Henry can be persuasive. He speaks that he is one of those who has a hand as well as the sword. He is almost as if he and they are brothers, all the men of the same class and the same country - England. This is the only personality outside himself when Henry is speaking his men to fight bravely. He speaks a very formal speech by using words like "gentle" and "fair".

"Dear friends... your noble English... made in England... you are worth your breeding."

This is a summary of the speech and it shows how Henry creates a relationship with his subjects, and how he creates a strong personal connection. Through his words, Henry speaks to the general of the army in Act 2 Scene 4. He changes his ability to put them into an army. With his words he puts them through a series of his army's "laid out and upon the ground". This speech is very powerful as it shows Henry's ability to persuade. The connection that he creates with his men is very important. They also demonstrate how Henry always has to change his personality and temperament.

Henry is very able to change his character to match the situation that he is facing. On the one hand, he needs to be an inspirational and for the army. For, on the other hand, he has to be very soft and kind to be loved and trusted. He is sometimes required to be harsh, and at other times he needs to be lenient. These aspects are very important of Henry's ability to change his character between when he needs to be a leader, and when he needs to be a friend. As the father writes Macbeth with some historical words "It is better for the prince to die by his own hand." The one who writes Henry seems to create him as a leader because he has a great understanding of the subjects, and as an effective leader for them. One thing which Henry's subjects would like upon him to have is an understanding of the forces, it to be a great general.

Henry is greatly respected and followed in the religious tradition. His general attitude to religion makes him an effective leader. He was a very religious man and he always felt very much to being an soldier throughout the play. He always goes to God when it comes for help, and thank God when he receives something. This is shown when he asks the gods of Agincourt. The night before the battle Henry prays "O God of battles, steel my soldiers' hearts." This shows Henry that God is there to help whenever he calls upon him. So when people go after to God after winning the battle the whole kingdom will love the king as he, Henry replies "Thanked be God, and our strength for it." This also shows how Henry made that a change from the king, and he truly and sincerely depends on him. In these religious times, the king that the king was a strong believer of God was good, for it influenced
