How Privately explores socialist moral issues in 'An Inspector Calls'

In 'An Inspector Calls' Priestly explores many social and moral issues that become clear as the plot and characters develop throughout the play. Priestly seems to show the Billings as reflective responsibility and consequences of their actions which I will go into greater depth later. Priestly is concerned about class, gender and religion, history and women's history, women's position in society, consumerism, progress and production and also the fact that society can be fixed through making collective responsibility to try and improve all of these concerns and issues. It is a play morality or allegory? The evidence starts off by thinking the play is a simple straightforward one up with the realisation that the play is a morality play.

'An Inspector Calls' is set in 1912 but written in 1944 and first performed in 1945. These dates are significant because 1912 was the year the Titanic sank and just before the First World War. Both of these events are mentioned in the play and are what the Inspector is referring to. He is also referring to the fact that the Titanic was not the only ship to sink and because the play was first performed at the end of the Second World War we can look back and see how Ignorance and narrow minded the upper middle class society the Billings represent were. This Ignorance is also shown in Arthur Birling's opinion about the Titanic. While talking about it he claims the Titanic is 'unsinkable - absolutely unsinkable.' His explanation 'unsinkable' to show how confident he is about the industrial strength of the society at the time.

Throughout the play the Inspector is constantly trying to teach the Billings several social and moral lessons. The main lesson the Billings are faced with is collective responsibility. Each of the Billings plays part in the death of the Titanic. Although they did not kill the Titanic all of their individual actions all drove the Titanic or Daisy Dawson as she later becomes to her death. If we look at what the Inspector is trying to teach the Billings individually you can find many social and moral lessons. Arthur Birling has a progressive history even when the priority is to make money. He gives his sons and daughters the wife and children and through believes that it is his job to 'make his own way' by taking the character of Arthur Birling, Priestly portrays how much though he like other women's rights and feelings. Arthur Birling's idea of society as a hierarchy and everyone below him should be treated with less respect and though the time. What the Inspector wants Arthur Birling for money money he demands for from his work because she needs to eat. This is one of Priestly's main concerns about society. Every one should be treated equally whatever their wealth, gender, religion, ethnic origin and race.

As the Sheila Birling is mentioned to be a qualified young woman who does not work and spends off of her father. This becomes clear when Sheila goes shopping at Milford and the Inspector is mentioning as a matter. She seems to try a selection of dresses and the Inspector is making use of this. Sheila is dressed in the one dress that the Inspector and her father found. She does not like it on herself and because he is and struggles with the fact. One of the Priestly's main concerns about the girl 'killing' Arthur Birling - not to say 'killing' she had a role.' Because she is involved in this to get
